Q: What are the recommended practices for a data layer class in Rails? I have a data object that is essential to most of the controllers in my application, so I would like to create a data class to hold it. What are the recommended practices for this? I have read about "pending classes" (where a different module is responsible for creating the data object), but I prefer the approach of adding a class to my models folder. Is this considered an anti-pattern? I have tried to search for the topic but the results don't really tell me enough about what the best practices are. Update just to clarify my problem a bit more: I have a data object that needs to be available to every controller in my application, as well as all of the models. This data object should have a few properties, but it shouldn't be particularly complex. I will not be adding any additional methods, but I'd like to avoid repeating the same code in the controllers if I can. A: I can recommend you to use Pending class with db_counter_name, example: class MyPendingClass include ActiveRecord::Model attr_accessor :db_counter_name validates :id, :status, :db_counter_name, presence: true validate :validate_db_counts private def validate_db_counts
